Bilya (river) looms large in Perth Festival 2021. Across the Swan coastal plain there are lakes, rivers and waterholes all interconnected, both in terms of Noongar cultural practice and in geological ways. It is a privilege to be welcoming this truth-telling performance here at Galup (Lake Monger) into the Festival program, with Ian Wilkes' extraordinary range of storytelling skills on display as forgotten histories are brought back into the light.

A NOTE FROM IAN WILKES

As a Wadjuk Noongar man I feel that I have a responsibility to my people. This involves doing whatever I can to help improve our way of living. I am a performing artist and theatre-maker but my Noongar culture is what grounds all this. Over my career as a performer, I have learnt that each show I choose to be a part of will have an effect on me and my life. Galup has been a perfect example for me to show why I do what I do. It has also been an incredible journey, where close bonds were made through trust. Working relationships grew into friendships and some friends became family, which I believe is the best way to create good work.

The idea for Galup basically started with a phone call in 2017. Poppy van Oorde-Grainger rang me to chat about creating a show together. I had worked with Poppy previously on another project that involved empowering Noongar youth through language, music and dance. But the collaboration for Galup would be a bit different to that. She wanted to apply for Know Thy Neighbour funding from International Arts Space to make a one-person show at the lake with me as the performer. The idea was that I would guide the audience around the lake and along the way they would participate in scenes and learn about the lake's history.

She asked me 'what do you know about Lake Monger?'. I said 'well, I know there was a 'massacre' that happened there and not many people know about it'. My dad always told me about it every time we would drive past the lake. 'It was covered up by the wadjelas' he would say. 'A lot of Noongar were killed there when the whitefellas first arrived'. Poppy didn't know about this and not a lot of people do. The question is why? Why is it that things such as this are not widely known? I think that was the moment we both realised there is a story here that needs to be told.

We began digging and researching, trying to find out more. We spent time in libraries reading books, accounts, colonial journals and records of Noongar oral history interviews. This excited me and I was amazed that I had discovered a passion for local histories. We found interesting stories and strange events that all connected to Lake Monger. We spoke with Noongar Elders and asked about the lake and the 'unknown massacre'. We were eventually pointed in the right direction when various people told us to go speak with Nan Doolann Leisha Eatts. In my mind I already felt a show beginning to form but I didn't really grasp the significance of this project until we met with Nan.

Nan Doolann had a story, passed down by her grandmother, that spoke of the massacre from the Noongar point of view. Poppy and I travelled to Nan's place in Koondoola and sat around her kitchen table to hear her story. It was a powerfully tragic yarn that deeply saddened me. I thought this is the truth we were searching for. I wanted audiences to feel the way I did right then and there after hearing Nan's story. To hear the cracking of her voice as she spoke so openly about something so horrible, then sit in the heavy silence that follows. Unsure of what to say and how to feel, yet strangely relieved and grateful to have heard it. This somehow was the essence of the show we knew we should be presenting. I knew Poppy felt the same way and so our ideas began to grow and develop.

Nan's story is an important part of Galup, and she wanted to be in the show as well. We arranged to have her meet the audience at the start and then at the end while a recording of her story plays through a speaker, leaving them feeling the same way I did when sitting around her kitchen table. Having her presence within the first shows was an amazing achievement for her especially at the age of 80+.

As the solo performer for the rest of the show, I took on all character roles and guided the audience through the other scenes and elements of the show. I found this incredibly difficult at first. Performing solo is hard even on a stage but being outside and guiding audiences around a lake while switching characters was particularly challenging! But I feel with Poppy's direction and guidance, we achieved something really impressive that sets the show apart from anything else.

We performed two shows in 2019 with an audience of 15 max each show. Having small, intimate audiences was a key element considering the show we created was a site-specific performance where audiences walk around the lake. We liked the feeling of the smaller engagement as it allowed the audience to truly connect to me, Nan and also the lake itself.

However, Poppy and I knew that if we are wanting to make a bigger impact and create more awareness, we needed to show it to more than 30 people! Poppy set up a not-for-profit production company called Same Drum and we started discussions with Performing Lines WA to see if they would be interested in co-producing a season of Galup with Same Drum to help us reach more audiences.

After discussions about the show and why its story needs to be told, we got a promise from the Festival. They believed in the show and would program it for 2021. I am incredibly excited to perform and share Galup as part of Perth Festival and hope audiences will find it fun and exciting, yet powerful and deeply moving.

Amongst all this, Poppy and I also developed the idea to produce a virtual reality film of Galup to reach larger audiences. This really excited me. I love watching VR and thought this could help us spread the awareness that the story truly deserves. The VR film will be set at the lake and focuses on the massacre. It will be a 5 – 10 minute experience where people can immerse themselves in the beauty of the lake whilst uncovering its history. Poppy and I spent months writing the script, which was another exciting new challenge, distilling a 90-minute performance into a 10-minute film. We also consulted VR filmmaker Briega Whitehead whose input was extremely valuable. We are currently in pre-production and I am happy with the direction we are heading in.

It has been an incredible journey from the first phone call with Poppy. Now the Galup project has grown and so too has its team and support. We now have four Noongar Elders advising us. These Noongar Biridiya Cultural Consultants are Doolann Leisha Eatts, Liz Hayden, Darryl Kickett and Ted Wilkes. Their guidance and cultural input are vital for shaping Galup the right way to reflect the voices of Noongar people. With these Elders and support from the Museum of Freedom and Tolerance, we designed long-term impact goals for the project, which include building a memorial at the lake. We believe there needs to be a permanent reminder of the history that occurred there and how it still affects us all. Through the project we will advocate for a memorial that is cultural, respectful, immersive and utilises the recreational use of paths surrounding the lake. I have felt the need for this ever since hearing Nan speak her story.

Poppy and I are super thankful for all the support we have received over the years from these Elders and the many other individuals and partner organisations, and will continue the Galup project until our impact goals are reached. We have always kept in mind that the lake is now a place of healing. It is special and sacred, and we all share it. We all share its story and people only need to open up to the truth to feel the energy Galup gives.

A NOTE FROM POPPY VAN OORDE- GRAINGER

When I saw an ad for a project called Know Thy Neighbour, it grabbed my attention. The project was run by International Art Space and involved commissioning artists to make work about where they live. I moved to Australia when I was 13, so I've always been drawn to art that helps people connect to their community. For two decades that passion led me to work on many projects in regional and remote communities but, as I read the Know Thy Neighbour ad, I felt it was time to find out the story of my own suburb.

Image: Poppy van Oorde-Grainger

In particular, I wanted to know more about Galup, the lake near my house, or Lake Monger as it's more commonly known. Up until then I'd only got as far as reading stories online about a spear-throwing contest at the lake in the 1830s and Noongars going to a white person's house afterwards to dance around a piano. When I started to imagine making work about these stories, I immediately thought of collaborating with Ian Wilkes. Ian and I first worked together at Narrogin Senior High School and watching him in action was incredible. He was brilliant at inspiring people to learn language and dance and was a total joy to work with. I imagined creating a performance where Ian would take small groups to the lake and show them stories in the same playful, interactive way he'd connected with teenagers in Narrogin. When I called, Ian was keen to collaborate and said his dad told him that a lot of Noongar were killed at that lake. At that moment, a project that I thought would be for teenagers and kids, became something else.

Researching felt like putting a puzzle together. We went to libraries and spoke with organisations, academics and Elders, including Ian's dad Ted Wilkes, who all told us to speak with Elder Doolann Leisha Eatts. Doolann is the great-great-granddaughter of a Whadjuk Noongar woman, whose name is unknown, and an Englishman, John Henry Monger, who the lake is named after. When we met Doolann, that's when the penny dropped. She told us a story her grandmother had told her about Noongar people being slaughtered at Kings Park and Lake Monger. She said she wanted to share this story in the performance and by any means possible.

After the research phase, Ian and I began writing the performance on-country with cultural guidance from Ted and Doolann and later Liz Hayden and Darryl Kickett. The characters Ian plays in Galup use song, dance and language to share stories of the history and significance of the lake. We start with a lot of playfulness and connection to country to keep the audiences' hearts open and safe when they hear Doolann's story at the end. Ultimately, we want the show to be an opportunity to connect, understand our shared history and create a space for healing.

The day before our first showing, a djiti-djiti (willy-wagtail) came and sat on Ian's shoulder and then on my head. Doolann and Ted said it was a good sign! There have been so many special moments like that, from watching turtles laying eggs to seeing a rainbow start and finish 10 metres away. For me personally, Galup has been a very meaningful project. By far the most powerful part has been the relationships formed with everyone on the project. It's been a massive effort from an incredible team of collaborators and supporters that continues to grow every day. My heart was full after the first showing. Knowing the truth feels so much better than knowing nothing at all.

BEYOND THE SHOW

The stories told through the Galup project are part of a complex landscape of colonial violence. Galup/Lake Monger is a place where Noongar and British culture intersected in a traumatic and destructive way. The Galup performance gives people an experience that empowers them to understand and recognise the destructive nature of colonial systems and beliefs that are still in place – through active listening, uncovering and acknowledging history and memorialising alternative narratives.

The Galup team aims to use the arts as a vehicle for truth telling and creating open dialogue that brings people together. The team wants the project to create a space where connection, healing and relationship-building can occur.

Our six impact goals are:

- Increasing awareness of Galup/Lake Monger's history and significance
- Increasing understanding of how the violence of settler colonisation continues to impact Australia today
- Promoting the transformative impact of truth telling as a tool for healing and justice
- Embedding the history of Galup/Lake Monger in curriculum in local schools
- Creating a permanent legacy at the lake that tells the stories in the Galup performance, for example a memorial, a sound work, signage and/or an annual event
- Encouraging positive collaborations between First Nations people and other Australians by sharing the story of how the Galup project was made
